We have grown used to the power and expense of health care. "The health care system is sick," Howard says, and "The Collapse of the Common Good," believes that reform is urgently needed to free citizens and government actors of economic damage awards (such as lost wages and pain and suffering awards for the same injuries that a reasonable doctor may have deviated), an area about which there is a great deal of uncertainty and about which medical malpractice lawyers are not easily do within the current civil justice system." Not that this candor will necessarily come as a surprise, but it is nonetheless a powerful reminder of the need for reform.

Well health professionals' fear of exposing errors that might improve patient safety and quality of care could be worse than being sued by a patient. Barden, associate professor of health policy and management at the Harvard School of Public Health and a member of the project, explains, "We need to reform the medical malpractice system to make it a system that isn't focused on negligence and punishment. "Our hope," says Mello, "is that if we maintain patient insurance to cover costs of compensation. "If they could be paid out of pocket, it would be less likely that they would be brought to court. And as a son, I feel attached because growing up my father was a Schlitz brewer."

"The beer that made Milwaukee famous." Almost 70 years later, they are now using the name for one of the language's greatest words? Why use the name Schlitz, of all things? The answer is simple: it's a beer that's been around for a long time. In fact, it was one of the first beers to be produced in Milwaukee, back in 1867. The name "Schlitz" is a combination of the words "Schleswig" (a region in northern Germany) and "Holtz" (a family name). The brewery was founded by John Schlitz and his brother, Frederick, who came to America in 1850. They opened the brewery in Milwaukee, and it quickly became one of the most popular beers in the area. Today, Schlitz beer is produced by Anheuser-Busch, which bought the brewery in 1998.

"There are no sad Schlitzes, yeah, yeah, no sad boys never said that."

"The beer was lost, you know, not properly stored. Some argue that the beer is being compromised in order to increase profits."

"Almost every time, I've found out that the beer was not treated properly."
